

Arthur Craig, Alger, MI.

I just learned that Boyce Hydropower plans to lower the water level on their series of dams in central Michigan at the end of this month for inspections. The rivers and lakes that feed these dams are a critical source of commerce for the area for tourism and recreation. There are thousands of people with boats and other equipment that will need to be removed before winter anyway, why can't the inspections be done after the season is done? Allowing them to lower the level before winter causes an extreme hardship to all the property owners in the region.
